Background

Medical education enthusiasts in several countries are focusing on developing novel teaching learning modalities which would achieve active engagement and higher levels of understanding amongst students. Human Anatomy has been perceived by many students as a difficult subject to comprehend and recall. "Fables in Anatomy" (FIA) is one novel innovative narrative pedagogical strategy where anatomical structures are explained in form of short fictional stories which integrates visual art. The current study was carried out to evaluate the impact of "Fables in Anatomy - Pedagogical strategy" on student performance. It also aims to assess students' attitudes towards the same.

Summary Of Work

FIA modules were prepared on five topics from musculoskeletal system and introduced in small group teaching sessions. To analyse the impact of supplementation of Fables in anatomy, the MCQ scores in post-test of students who attended novel narrative strategy -FIA (group 1) were compared with those who attended the traditional teaching (group 2). Students' experiences with Fables in Anatomy and their attitudes towards inclusion of the same into the course curriculum were analysed using a feedback questionnaire that was given to students who attended the sessions. Three Focus Group discussion were conducted including 8 students each and in-depth discussion were performed. The student volunteers were probed regarding usefulness, feasibility, merits and demerits of the novel narrative strategy.

Summary Of Results

Students who underwent FIA sessions performed considerably better than the students who underwent traditional sessions ( $p < 0.001$ ). Analysis of the feedback questionnaire suggests majority of the students find Fables in Anatomy more interesting, fun filled, less stressful and the sessions help them to understand the anatomical concepts in a simplified manner. The constant theme that came into light through the focus group discussions was that, Fables help in better retention of the concept.

Discussion And Conclusion

Fables in anatomy sessions was well received by the students.

Majority of the students have reported merits like better understanding in combination with retaining of the concepts and active engagement.

Take Home Messages

Based on the results of the current study, we opine that supplementation of routine didactic lectures with sessions of Fables would be beneficial in terms of student engagement with improvised knowledge in course content.
